Mission

Tennesseans for Alternatives to the Death Penalty (TADP) seeks to honor life by abolishing the death penalty in Tennessee. We work to accomplish this mission by educating Tennesseans about the problems with the death penalty system and empowering citizens to act for change.

Background

TADP was founded in 1992 but belongs to a long line of Tennessee death penalty organizations dating back more than 30 years. In the 1970's, an informal coalition of activists, Tennesseans Against the Death Penalty (TADP), did grassroots organizing aimed at blocking the reinstatement of the death penalty. In 1977, TADP prompted the state legislature to hold two days of public hearings rallying statewide support; yet, the legislature voted to reinstitute capital punishment. However, another 23 years would pass before Tennessee would carry out an execution.

The activists next determined a formal, anti-death penalty organization was needed. The new name, Tennessee Coalition to Abolish State Killing (TCASK), reflected a new commitment to build a statewide coalition to do grassroots organizing and education, empowering citizens to advocate for passage of abolition legislation. In 1992, this group sought official 501(c)(3) status which was granted in early 1993. TCASK hired its first staff in 1999. In 2005, TCASK secured a Jesuit volunteer to work as a field organizer, expanding outreach and effectiveness across the state. In 2006, the volunteer became a full time staff organizer enabling TCASK to reach new milestones.

In 2006, Reverend Stacy Rector became the new Executive Director. Previously, she served on TCASK's Board of Directors while frequently speaking on behalf of the organization. She also served as a visitor on Tennessee's death row for ten years and as spiritual advisor to Steve Henley, who was executed in 2009.

In 2008, Denver Schimming joined TCASK as an organizer focusing on outreach to law enforcement and surviving family members of murder. Denver met with over 200 members of law enforcement across the state, building relationships and creating dialogue.

In October 2009, TCASK changed its name to Tennesseans for Alternatives to the Death Penalty (TADP). The new name affirms the need for alternatives to hold violent offenders accountable and to protect the public without the use of the death penalty. In 2011, TADP hired Jamie Moeller as organizer, and in 2014, TADP hired Justin Phillips, after Jamie Moeller's departure. Justin is a native Tennessean, attended Union University in Jackson, TN, and has a PhD in ethics from Fuller Seminary. He has excelled in making connections with more conservative and evangelical Christians statewide, expanding our reach and bringing new voices into the conversation.

In 2015, TADP launched Tennessee Conservatives Concerned about the Death Penalty (TADP) and hired Amy Lawrence in July 2015. Amy worked as the Southern Field Representative for Congressman Diane Black and volunteered on behalf of Governor Bill Haslam and Rep. Pat Marsh. Amy also served as Executive Assistant to the Commissioner of Mental Health and Substance Abuse Services.

Impact

The death penalty is an inefficient, inequitable, and expensive government program that does not make our communities safer nor ensure swift and sure justice for victims' families. Tennesseans believe that all people should be treated equally under the law, but Tennessee's death penalty is applied unfairly, even for similar crimes. Some people are sentenced to die because they couldn't afford a better lawyer or because they live in a county that often seeks the death penalty. In fact, forty percent of Tennessee's death row comes from one county—Shelby—while half of Tennessee's counties have never sent anyone to death row. The death penalty system risks the execution of innocent people with over 150 individuals nationwide released from death rows after evidence of their innocence emerged. Tennessee has released four men, wrongfully convicted and sentenced to death, and continues to pay millions more to maintain this broken death penalty system than for a system whose maximum sentence is life without parole.

In 2014, TADP created a film, "To Honor Life," that highlights a variety of voices speaking out for repeal, including a former Tennessee Commissioner of Corrections, a murder victim's family member, and a former prosecutor. This film is featured on TADP's website and has been widely distributed across the state.

TADP has active chapters statewide and holds an annual Justice Day on the Hill to educate legislators. Throughout the year, TADP provides presentations to universities and communities of faith, including presentations through our Sharing Our Stories program. This program provides opportunities for surviving family members of murder and death row exonerees to share their stories and their opposition to the death penalty. In 2015, TADP's Sharing Our Stories program participants provided nearly 30 presentations to civic groups, faith communities, and high schools and universities statewide.

In 2015, TADP launched Tennessee Conservatives Concerned about the Death Penalty (TNCC) to give conservative Tennesseans a platform to share their concerns and their belief that the death penalty is inconsistent with conservative values. TNCC is educating the public and the media about its work and demonstrating that concerns about this issue cross party and ideological lines. To learn more visit tnconservativesconcerned.org.

This year TADP is joining with mental health advocates in an educational campaign to exclude those with severe mental illness from the death penalty. The coalition, Tennessee Alliance for the Severe Mental Illness Exclusion (TASMIE) is educating groups statewide about this important issue. You can read more about this effort at TASMIE.org.

Needs

TADP serves the entire state of Tennessee with two full-time staff, one part-time staff, and one contract staff. We receive no funding from any state or federal sources. Instead, TADP relies on individuals and private foundations for all of its funding. Our outreach and effectiveness could increase exponentially with an additional staff person to help with our organizing and educational efforts statewide. Additionally, because we have a modest budget, every dollar donated makes a large impact on the work that we are able to accomplish. With a well-funded campaign, TADP believes that we could achieve our mission in Tennessee within the next five years.

Other ways to donate, support, or volunteer

TADP welcomes donations by check mailed to our post office box. We have regular chapter meetings in Nashville, Knoxville, and Memphis. Please see our website of information.

Board Chair Statement

TADP has singular mission: to repeal the death penalty in the state of Tennessee. In the current political climate in this state, our mission requires education of Tennessee citizens and legislators on an issue that most people wish to avoid consideration of altogether. When people are confronted with the facts and compelled to consider them, they tend to agree, regardless of their political orientation, that the death penalty should be reconsidered. However, this is not an issue that affects the day to day lives of many people, and getting their attention and compelling action is a challenge. The road is long, and we need sustained action and funding of that action even though our progress (changing hearts and minds one person at a time) is not always apparent. We have made progress. We have had some substantial monetary support from surprising sources, but we need more for the long journey. Legislators from both sides of the aisle are listening. We are not infrequently told by them that if we bring their constituents along, they are ready to give us serious consideration. People are increasingly skeptical of the state prosecutorial apparatus; through our efforts they have seen and heard from the growing number of exonerees who were wrongfully accused and convicted. People are tiring of the enormous cost of the death penalty. The tide is slowly turning.

Our board members tend to be passionate death penalty abolitionists due to various life experiences, and these board members are not typically people who have access to wealth or the wealthy. One challenge is to find board members who share our passion and who have access to those of a different socio-economic status. We are seeking out those individuals to join with us in accomplishing our mission.

CEO Statement

Though Tennesseans have a wide variety of opinions on the death penalty both for and against, as a public policy, the death penalty system is a failure. The administration of the death penalty in Tennessee is unfair, particularly to those who are poor, is racially biased, and continues to execute those with severe mental illness and intellectual disabilities. The system costs taxpayers far more than a system which utilizes life without parole as its maximum punishment, and most disturbingly, the system is unreliable with over 150 people to date released from death rows nationwide when evidence of their innocence emerged. Tennessee has released four wrongfully convicted individuals who were sentenced to death.

TADP is committed to repeal this public policy that drains vital resources away from effective crime prevention measures, such as educational opportunities, drug treatment, mental health care, resources for law enforcement, as well as funding to support surviving family members of murder. We can hold offenders accountable, protect our families, and prevent violent crime without the death penalty. Join us to make your voice heard.

Programs

Programs

Sharing Our Stories

Description

Sharing Our Stories is an innovative program pairing TADP staff and advocates with surviving family members of murder victims, death row exonerees, and families of the executed to provide presentations to faith communities, schools, and organizations. This program allows those most directly affected by this policy to share their stories and their support of death penalty repeal. There are currently 15 individuals participating in this program who make presentations across the state. TADP continues to empower these families through speaking engagements and events specifically organized to offer support to those who has lost loved ones to violence or who have been wrongfully convicted and sentenced to death.

Student Conference on the Death Penalty

Description

High school and college students from across the state gather at a college or university in February to attend the annual Student Conference on the Death Penalty. Over the past nine years, this conference has included nearly 1,300 Tennessee students. Keynote speakers from past conferences include Nick and Amanda Wilcox whose daughter, Laura, was murdered while volunteering at a mental health clinic by a man with severe and persistent mental illness; Vicki Shieber whose daughter, Shannon, was murdered while attending graduate school; David Kaczynski, whose brother Ted is the so-called Unabomber; and Juan Melendez, who spent nearly 18 years on Florida's death row for a crime he didn't commit.

Following the keynote address, students hear from a variety of panels on topics such as Mental Illness and the Death Penalty, Sharing Our Stories: Murder Victims' Families Speak, and Legal Perspectives on the Death Penalty. These workshops are facilitated by local experts from the field, as well as those who have been directly affected by the system, like Paul House - Tennessee's second death row exoneree - and his mother, Joyce. TADP hopes that this conference will lead to more education and empowerment statewide, as these energized young people return to their campuses ready to spread the word and take action.

Tennessee Conservatives Concerned about the Death Penalty

Description	Conservatives in Tennessee are taking a stand to re-evaluate the current capital punishment system. Polls show that national support for the death penalty has steadily decreased over the past two decades and has reached a 40-year low – even among conservatives who have traditionally been strong proponents of capital punishment. Our state continues to spend millions of dollars a year on an unpopular punishment that hasn't been used since 2009. The 2004 Tennessee Comptroller's "Tennessee's Death Penalty: Costs and Consequences" report revealed that death penalty trials cost an average of 48 percent more than the average cost of trials in which prosecutors seek life imprisonment. The death penalty fails at both efficiency and results. Tennessee Conservatives Concerned about the Death Penalty (TNCC) provides a platform for Tennessee conservatives to question this system marked by inefficiency, inequity, and inaccuracy and to educate other conservatives statewide about this failed policy that doesn't make us safer, risks executing the innocent, and is wasteful and expensive.

Tennessee Alliance for the Severe Mental Illness Exclusion (TASMIE)

Description	Working with the TASMIE coalition, TADP will educate Tennesseans about the human and financial costs of pursuing the death penalty for those who suffer from severe mental illness and why these individuals should not be eligible for a death sentence. Recognizing the need for public safety, life without parole will still be an option for these violent offenders, but with death off the table, victims' families will be provided legal finality much sooner, the state will save millions of dollars that can be used for mental health treatment and compensation for victims' families, and those who are less culpable for their crimes because of a severe mental illness will not be subject to execution.

CEO Comments

Across the country, the death penalty is falling out of use. As more voices join this conversation--including political conservatives, members of corrections, murder victims' families, death row exonerees, and law enforcement--more citizens are learning of the failures and risks of this antiquated system.

In 2015, Nebraska become the 19th state to end the use of the death penalty, and Utah nearly did so in 2016. More and more Tennesseans are recognizing the system's flaws, including its exorbitant cost, the risk of executing an innocent person, and the toll the decades-long process takes on victims families.

Now is the time to get involved with TADP's work and to help us make history by ending Tennessee's death penalty. Supporting and engaging these critical programs will get us to repeal.

CEO Comments

TADP's work toward repeal would be greatly enhanced by more capacity to educate and organize statewide. TADP does not have the resources to hire more staff, but to address this need, the organizations does solicit volunteers and interns.

In the past, we have benefited from the services of volunteers through the Young Adult Volunteer Program of the Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.), allowing TADP to have a passionate staff member working 32 hours per week. Interns from local universities also help TADP to increase its capacity for educating and organizing citizens statewide.

Management

Executive Director/CEO

Executive Director	Rev. Stacy Rector
Term Start	Oct 2006

Experience

The Reverend Stacy Rector is a native of Dyersburg, Tennessee, and graduated cum laude with a B.A. in Religious Studies and Psychology from Rhodes College. She also was inducted as a member of Phi Beta Kappa in 1993. Reverend Rector attended Columbia Theological Seminary in Atlanta from 1993 to 1996 on full scholarship where she received a Masters of Divinity, including special recognition in the area of Hebrew Bible. During her seminary years, Reverend Rector spent time at the Open Door Community in Atlanta, serving the homeless and advocating for an end to the death penalty and the rights of those on death row in Georgia. She served as an assistant chaplain in a women's correctional facility in Atlanta during the summer of 1995 and as a part-time staff member of the nonprofit Prison Ministries with Women. The following summer, in 1996, Reverend Rector taught in Nanjing, China at Nanjing Theological Seminary as an ESL teacher. Upon her return to the US, she served as a chaplain at Grady Memorial Hospital in Atlanta, especially focusing on those with long-term mental illness.

Reverend Rector was called as Associate Pastor of Second Presbyterian Church in Nashville in 1997 and was ordained as a Minister of the Word and Sacrament in the Presbyterian Church (USA) on January 25, 1998. During her tenure at Second Presbyterian Church, she created a thriving youth program, facilitated the development of the community outreach ministries of the church, preached and taught on a regular basis, and served as the acting Head of Staff of the church for a period of 9 months.

Reverend Rector has worked with a number of Tennessee organizations promoting social justice, including the Restorative Justice Coalition of Tennessee, where she served as a board member, and the clergy caucus of Tying Nashville Together—a grassroots, interfaith organization advocating for systemic change in Nashville. She served as a Board member of People of Faith Against the Death Penalty and currently serves on the Committee on Preparation for Ministry of the Presbytery of Middle Tennessee and the board of Community Shares Tennessee.
